Dear Mr. Casey:

Recently, St. John's University launched a new publication, St. John's Today, in an attempt to chronicle all of the relevant news of the various constituencies of the University -- students, faculty, administrators, staff and alumni. The idea of the new paper is to report news and stories about the intellectual growth, Catholic atmosphere, dedication to research, and advancement of knowledge reflected in the life at St. John's.

As one of our most prominent alumni, I wonder if you might take some time to share with our students some of your memories of the University and/or some of your career experiences on how you arrived where you are today. I think such a story would be both informative and inspirational.

Should you care to write such an article, might I suggest that it run approximately four or five typewritten pages? Length, however, is not really that important. If you have a photograph of yourself (preferably in black and white and preferably a candid or "action" shot at your desk, conducting a meeting, giving a speech, etc.) that would also add to the impact of the piece. Your approach could be either formal or conversational. The point is to let our current students know how one of our "past" students entered the professional world.

In advance, I thank you for your time and appreciate any consideration that you may give in participating in writing for St. John's Today. I know the students will be grateful too.

With all good wishes, I am

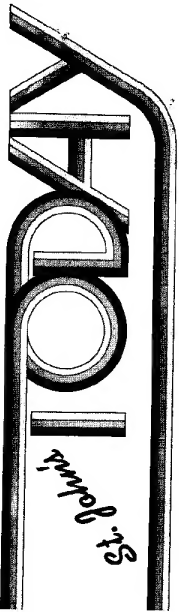

Sincerely yours,

STAT
